Thanks for tying these strands together!
Growing up in the Chicago area it was a long time before I had even heard of Angel Island – this exhibit by Flo Oy Wong was one I heard of that gave me another perspective: <https://www.sfgate.com/entertainment/article/FAMILY-SECRETS-An-Angel-Island-art-project-3239895.php>

I initially read "They Called Us Enemy", "We Hereby Refuse", and "This Light Between Us" to see if they might be useful learning resources for students (including our own kids)... and (like today) I learned a lot from each one (both historical, and provoking questions about today and our shared future). (Samira Ahmed's "Internment" is a YA novel set in the present/near-future that also provokes these questions.)

I give my students (future children's librarians in the School of Information Sciences) a list of children's and YA books set during incarceration and let them choose. We always have a great discussion even when they read different books!

To me this really reinforces how consistent this is with other learning goals for our students, especially disrupting a binary view of American history as between White and non-White thank you for the resources! I have been checking our Local library in Lisle (IL) and they have more Asian American book titles and authors from K-12. I am really glad we don't have " banned books" here in our state.

I deeply appreciated the way that you interwove the history of different groups, experiences, and stories together which I think is a testament to how you cannot have the truest American history without Asian Americans. So often history feels so segmented in K-12 education, but the best ways to understand our past is interwoven.

19:53:10 From jordan weatherl to Everyone:
Book banning I think is an important component of this conversation and I know that House Bill 2789 in Illinois also just passed that fights against bans like this.

I was reading an article today about how the Florida governor has signed his anti-DEI bill today and it was horrifying. I knew it was coming, but the reality is incredibly frightening.
